Colon"y
History Walk
Customs House
to Millers Point

CREATIVE
CITY
SYDNEY
The earliest European Sydneysiders, convicts, soldiers, whalers and sailors, all walked this route. Later came the shipping magnates, wharf labourers and traders. The Rocks and Millers Point have been overlaid by generations of change. But amongst the bustling modern city streets, remnants and traces of these early times can be found. Pubs and churches, archaeological digs and houses all evoke memories of past lives, past ways.

Please allow about 1–2 hours for the history walk.
Start at Customs House, Location 1

Customs House

George Peacock’s 1845 view of Customs House with The Rocks in the background (Image: Mitchell Library. State Library of NSW)

Customs House was where shipping was cleared and goods passing through the port of Sydney were taxed and cleared for sale or export. When the port was busy the House was crowded and noisy, a scene of raised tempers, delays and disputed dealings. Customs House was surrounded by public houses, shipping companies and general maritime activities.

Walk down Loftus Street alongside the House. A flag flies permanently on the site where the first British flag was raised. For some Australians, this is the site of invasion. In the little lane behind Customs House you can still see the old Hinchcliffs Woolstore with its loft pulleys. Now cross over Loftus Street and head for Macquarie Place. Opposite the park, through an archway, is Bulletin Place (2).

Bulletin Place

This rare historic streetscape provides a glimpse of some of the early warehousing which used to dominate this precinct. Bulletin Place was where J F Archibald’s famous weekly The Bulletin was published from 1880. This area, as a haunt for journalists and newspaper men, is regularly featured in late 19th century literature about Sydney.

Retrace your steps to Macquarie Place (3).

Macquarie Place

Originally swampy mangrove land on the banks of the Tank Stream, the colony’s first water supply, this small piece of land is awash with historic relics. The Obelisk marks the point from which distances to all places in the colony were measured. This sandstone monument was designed by Francis Greenway, who was sent to the colony for forgery and became Sydney’s first Colonial Architect. His legacy is visible in many of Sydney’s best–loved convict buildings. The imposing statue of Thomas Sutcliffe Mort (whose many achievements are listed on the plinth) looks out over Bridge Street, the premier financial street.
4 Bridge Street

Bridge Street was named for the wooden footbridge that crossed the Tank Stream. From the start, the town was both physically and socially divided by the Tank Stream. On the eastern side were the Governor’s house and the tents of the civil establishment. To the west were the makeshift barracks of the military and the convicts. Many signs of this social division remain today.

On Bridge Street the impressive sandstone Lands Department Building (5) is directly opposite Macquarie Place. Other government buildings to the east include the Education Department (6), the Museum of Sydney set back on the site of the first Government House (7) and the Chief Secretary’s Building (8). Turn right and head for George Street. On your way you will pass the ASX/Australian Stock Exchange (9), the former Exchange Hotel (10), the headquarters of Burns Philip (11) which was once one of the major shipping companies in the Pacific, and the Metropolitan Hotel (12) on the corner.

13 Grosvenor Place Towers

Before you leave the Metropolitan Hotel corner, notice its architectural similarity to the buildings diagonally across George Street. The old redbrick Johnsons Corner and Brooklyn Hotel were designed in about 1910 by Walter Liberty Vernon. Grosvenor Place towers behind these old buildings. A condition for building this tower (designed by Harry Seidler and constructed between 1982 and 1987) was that Johnsons Corner and The Brooklyn be retained.

Walk up Grosvenor Street past some fine old late 19th century façades to St Patrick’s Church (14).

14 St Patrick’s Church

This simple Gothic sandstone church was designed by J F Hilly and built in the 1840s on land donated by William Davis, a convict, who took part in the Irish Rebellion in 1798. The church has been the traditional heartland of Sydney’s Irish working class Roman Catholics. Many inner city children were educated at St Patrick’s school. A visit to this recently restored church and associated buildings is a worthwhile detour.

15 & 16

This area was dedicated by Governor Hunter as a church precinct and is still known as Church Hill. After convicts burnt down the first church near Sydney Cove, St Philip’s Anglican Church was built here in 1798–1807. The current St Philip’s (15) which you can see dates from 1848. The former Scots Presbyterian Church (16) was built to replace an older one demolished to make way for the approaches to the Sydney Harbour Bridge. Continue walking for a while down Harrington Street, pass under the Cahill Expressway and take the old worn steps on your left up to Cumberland Place (17) and Susannah Place (18).

17 Cumberland Place

Cumberland Place in 1901 (Photograph: State Records of NSW)
Colony History Walk
Customs House to Millers Point

Early maps show a lane on the alignment of the Cumberland Place steps as early as 1807. They lead to Gloucester Street. You are now in a network of streets and laneways that form the heartland of old residential Sydney.

Directly opposite Susannah Place (18) is the site of an archaeological dig which exposed remains and foundations of hundreds of houses, shops and hotels which were all crammed into this small site. Check out the excavated remains in the entrance to the Sydney Harbour YHA and learn more about the people who lived here at the The Big Dig Archaeology Education Centre. From Susannah Place make your way up the hill to the Australian Hotel (19).

Susannah Place

These little houses and the corner shop (58–64 Gloucester Street) date from the 1840s. They are now a museum where authentic interiors, including outhouses and basement kitchens, allow visitors to imagine typical mid 19th century working class life.

The Australian Hotel

This is a typical early 20th century hotel, built in 1914. It retains its original pressed metal ceilings and etched glass fittings. The split level bar follows the rugged lie of the land. The odd shape of the land is a result of street re-alignments for the building of the Sydney Harbour Bridge.

A short distance north along Cumberland Street, take the subway under the Sydney Harbour Bridge Stairs. The hill in front of you is Observatory Hill Park (20).

Observatory Hill Park

This is the site of Sydney’s first windmill. Also known as Fort Phillip and Flagstaff Hill, it eventually became known as Observatory Hill after the building of the sandstone observatory in 1858. While the colony’s astronomers were making scientific observations from this building, local Sydneysiders knew it best for its timekeeping. Every day at 1pm the ball on top of the tower dropped to signal the correct time. The entrance to the Observatory is up the hill. It is open daily, and its gardens provide wonderful views of the harbour and Walsh Bay wharves below.

Around the hill from the Observatory is the National Trust Centre (21). If you are short of time you may leave out this section, walk down the hill and rejoin the tour at the Garrison Church (27).

The National Trust Centre

The oldest building in this complex is the two storey former 1815 military hospital, now facing the expressway. This later became the famous Fort Street School, the first school to provide for teacher training in the colony. The National Trust Centre includes the S H Ervin Gallery, cafe and shop.

Millers Point

The second half of this walk will take you through a precinct where old 19th century sandstone buildings live side-by-side with red brick structures created in the first decades of the 20th century by the Sydney Harbour Trust. Thousands of men were employed cutting a deep swathe through the sandstone to create a two-tiered roadway system serving the new Walsh Bay wharves. The Trust then in-filled the new landscape they had created with utilitarian brick houses, shops and pubs. After that, building practically halted. The small-scale village atmosphere of Millers Point is a surprise find for many visitors fresh from the towering commercial buildings of the surrounding city.
Backtrack down the Agar Steps (22) on your left to a little row of terrace houses and then to Kent Street. Opposite the Agar Steps along High Street are early 20th century houses built by the Sydney Harbour Trust. Turn right and head down Kent Street to Argyle Place. Just before the corner, on your right, is the little St Brigid’s Church School (23), Australia’s oldest Roman Catholic building constructed 1834–35. On the corner is the post office. Diagonally opposite is the Lord Nelson Hotel (24), one of the oldest pubs in Sydney.

Built in 1836 by former plasterer William Wells as his home, the Lord Nelson obtained its liquor licence in 1841, one year before the town of Sydney was proclaimed a city. This makes it one of the oldest pubs in Sydney.

From here head right along Argyle Place. Or you may take a detour left, past the village shops built by the Sydney Harbour Trust to the old red brick Pallisade Hotel (25). Then track past the hotel and into Merriman Street, down to Clyne Reserve (26) at the end, and back along the walkway in front of the fine old townhouses perched high on the rocks overlooking Barangaroo and back to the Lord Nelson (24). Walk along Argyle Place past the village green to Garrison Church (27).

This was the first official military church in NSW and serviced the military garrison at Dawes Point. Imagine the spectacle of the redcoats marching up Lower Fort Street from the artillery barracks to attend morning prayer. Although the church was officially called the Holy Trinity Church, it continues to be known as the Garrison Church. Military flags still adorn the church’s interior.

Make your way down Lower Fort Street to the Hero of Waterloo (28) on the corner of Windmill Street.

The rough-cut sandstone walls and heavy timber beams of the interior of the Hero of Waterloo evoke an atmosphere of the rough mariner’s life. This hotel was built by George Paton, a stonemason, in 1843. The Hero of Waterloo is the source of many local stories of concealed trapdoors, shanghaied sailors and rum smuggling.
Cross Windmill Street to Ferry Lane (29).

Ferry Lane and the Paddock

This flagstone laneway once led to the waterfront. The history of the area is told in the plaques and signs in the lane and in the reserve below, called The Paddock.

Follow Ferry Lane to Pottinger Street, looking out for the interpretive signs along the way. Either cross Pottinger Street to a walkway that takes you to the upper level of Wharves 6/7 or turn right and follow Pottinger Street to Hickson Road. There are a number of restaurants, cafes and bars along this road and on the waterfront.

Walsh Bay Wharves

These huge two-storey timber wharves were part of the massive reconstruction generated by the Sydney Harbour Trust (later the Maritime Services Board), set up by the government in 1901 to “modernise” Sydney’s chaotic and inefficient waterfront. The wharves were intended to be built using concrete, but due to shortages of materials after World War I, timber was used. The wharves and their associated shore sheds form a rare group of industrial buildings and were built over a number of years after 1910. They were refurbished in 2003.

Retrace your steps to The Paddock, then take the path leading off Ferry Lane that runs along the rear of the line Georgian houses on Lower Fort Street. At the end of the lane take the steps up to Lower Fort Street. On the corner is the Georgian house Clyde Bank (31). Almost directly opposite you is the Harbour View Hotel (32), which was built by the Sydney Harbour Trust. Head down into George Street (North) back towards The Rocks passing the Cast Iron Urinal (33).

Cast Iron Urinal

This is the last remaining cast iron urinal in the city. Public conveniences and urinals (or pissoirs) were common streetscape elements in early 20th century Sydney.

On the opposite side of the road is Dawes Point/Tar-ra (34).

Dawes Point/Tar-ra

Tar-ra is the name that Aboriginal people gave to this point. Now it carries the name of the astronomer sent by the British Board of Longitude to establish an observatory in the new colony. Lieutenant William Dawes was also a linguist. His friendship with Patyegarang has resulted in one of the earliest dictionaries of Aboriginal words. Dawes Point Park has archaeological excavations and interpretation relating to the early fortification built here to deter England’s international enemies. The fort was demolished in 1925 to make way for the Sydney Harbour Bridge.

Continue down along George Street (North). You are now returning to The Rocks. You may wish to end your tour here and leave exploring The Rocks until another time. The Sydney Visitor Centre (38) offers information and brochures, while nearby in Kendall Lane, The Rocks Discovery Museum (39) tells the history and archaeology of The Rocks.

The Rocks

The higgledy-piggledy streets and narrow laneways which still define The Rocks record the first places the convicts and ex-convicts made their own. The vision of the convicts living in barracks weighed down by ball-and-chain is overstated. Many more convicts simply worked for the government during the day and worked for themselves the rest of the time, building houses, opening shops, running pubs and creating a new life. Today The Rocks is a living museum and practically every place has a story to tell.

The Rocks viewed from the eastern side of Circular Quay, 1850s (Photograph: Mitchell Library, State Library of NSW)

Not to be missed: Mariners Church (35), Argyle Cut (36), and Argyle Stores (37).
Discover historic Sydney with more walking tours in the series at cityofsydney.nsw.gov.au/history or request a copy by contacting the City of Sydney on 9265 9333.

Download the free Sydney Culture Walks app. Enjoy walks and historical points of interest direct to your mobile.

“Discover our city’s past by foot and explore the many stories of Sydney.”

Lord Mayor Clover Moore

Stop, Look, Listen, Think.
Look both ways before you step off the kerb.

Please reuse or recycle this guide.
Prepared by the City of Sydney's History Program.